Strict charity gambling law upheld - What does it mean for your organization?

Tesdahl, D Benson

Nonprofit World v12n6 PP: 16-17 Nov/Dec 1994

...TEXT: realities of operating a charity in tough economic times.

In states that are considering stricter gambling laws, charities should band together and conduct a well-organized lobbying effort. They need to convince state legislators that efforts such as those in Indiana to regulate charitable gambling will end up causing more harm than good. (Of course, any lobbying will have to be conducted within the legal lobbying limits. See " Selected References"). For example, charities can point out that overly harsh gambling rules only restrict the much-needed income that honest charities can make from bingo and similar events. This reduced income may force charities to decrease their charitable programs.

OTHER PROBLEMS WITH CHARITABLE GAMBLING EVENTS

Even in the absence of overly restrictive gambling statutes, charitable gambling is not without its problems. Perhaps the most common problem is the failure of many...

...as they choose. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, most cities have specific laws requiring charities to register, pay a fee, and obtain a permit before conducting raffles and similar activities...

...wise to check the rules thoroughly before attempting to add gambling to their arsenal of fundraising activities.

TEXT: Many charities enhance their revenues by exploiting one of America's favorite pastimes-- gambling. Charitable gambling activities include bingo, raffles, and similar games of chance.

States that have taken steps to regulate charitable gambling have usually been successful. A case in point is a recent federal district court decision. The court upheld a state law restricting a charity's ability to earn money from its weekly bingo events.

BACKGROUND FACTS

In There to...

...the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reviewed an Indiana statute restricting charitable gambling. The statute limited the number of gambling events a charity could conduct to only three per week, with no more than two in the same facility. The statute also limited the amount of rent a charity could pay for a gambling facility to $200 per day.

The charity , named "There to Care," conducted more than three bingo games each week at a large...

...displayed posters on the walls to proclaim its mission. It also recruited volunteers for its charitable work. In addition, proceeds from the bingo games supported its charitable activities. Thus, the bingo games were both a fundraising device and a means of spreading the word about the charity 's activities. The charity argued that the state's restrictions on its weekly bingo games violated its right of free speech.

THE COURT DISAGREES

The Seventh Circuit disagreed with the charity . It found that the state statute served purposes unrelated to the content of speech. Moreover...

...THE CASE

This case marks one of the few times that significant state regulation of charitable gambling has been challenged and upheld. Because a federal court of appeals decided the case, it is certain to catch the eye of other state officials. Consequently, charities should not be surprised to see other states tighten their charitable gambling laws in the coming months.

If that occurs, it will indeed be unfortunate. Common sense dictates that charities and the public are not protected if only three--instead of four or five--bingo games are held each week. Similarly, one has to wonder how a charity or the public is protected when a state arbitrarily limits rent for a bingo hall...

...who, in their zeal to fix a perceived problem, forget the realities of operating a charity in tough economic times.

In states that are considering stricter gambling laws, charities should band together and conduct a well-organized lobbying effort. They need to convince state legislators that efforts such as those in Indiana to regulate charitable gambling will end up causing more harm than good. (Of course, any lobbying will have to be conducted within the legal lobbying limits. See "Selected References"). For example, charities can point out that overly harsh gambling rules only restrict the much-needed income that honest charities can make from bingo and similar events. This reduced income may force charities to decrease their charitable programs.

OTHER PROBLEMS WITH CHARITABLE GAMBLING EVENTS

Even in the absence of overly restrictive gambling statutes, charitable gambling is not without its problems. Perhaps the most common problem is the failure of many charities to check the law before conducting a raffle or other event. Many charities erroneously believe that their nonprofit status automatically allows them to raise funds as they choose. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, most cities have specific laws requiring charities to register, pay a fee, and obtain a permit before conducting raffles and similar activities. Moreover, penalties for violating these laws can be quite stiff. Therefore, charities would be wise to check the rules thoroughly before attempting to add gambling to their...

ABSTRACT: The Charitable Solicitations Compliance Improvement (CSCI) study is based upon the belief in Congress and at the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) that charitable organizations in the US are engaging in questionable fund-raising practices. In the view of the IRS, these solicitations appear to mislead donors about the deductibility of their donations. The IRS has issued to agents a form containing a battery of 82 questions to use in reviewing the fund-raising activities of a charity.

The results of the CSCI study will be used to accumulate case-oriented statistical data and other data on the fund-raising methods and practices conducted by charitable organizations. This information will be provided to the Department of the Treasury and Congress for their consideration for legislative action. The administration has proposed making the present temporary exclusion for contributions of tangible personal property permanent and expanding it to cover intangible personal property and real property, which would encourage charitable contributions of property. ...TEXT: sent to its examining agents across the country instructions and guidance as to the ongoing Charitable Solicitations Compliance Improvement (CSCI) study. Patterns of care for rectal cancer patients: Quality-of-life, survival and physician's decision on choice of treatment

The present study examines the outcomes of rectal cancer patients undergoing surgery. We also wanted to examine factors affecting surgeon decision-making with regard to the type of surgical procedure they recommend. The purpose of this investigation was three fold: (1) to assess the quality-of-life in rectal cancer patients by type of surgery, location of tumor in the rectum and receipt of adjuvant therapy; (2) to estimate rectal cancer cause-specific survival and suggest possible explanations for the survival advantages of high volume hospitals and; (3) to identify and evaluate hypotheses influencing surgeon decision making regarding the recommendation of a sphincter-sparing sphincter-ablating surgical procedure.

The California Cancer Registry was used to identify rectal cancer patient demographic and treatment variables. Quality-of-life was assessed using the Functional Assessment of Cancer Treatment-Colorectal survey instrument administered to a cohort of rectal cancer patients. Survival was assessed through the registry follow-up methods. Hypotheses influencing decision making for surgical treatment were assessed using a questionnaire.

Our study of Northern California rectal cancer patients found those undergoing a sphincter-ablating surgery did not have worse quality-of-life patients undergoing sphincter-sparing surgeries. Quality-of-life did not differ by location of the tumor in the rectum and differences in quality-of-life due to adjuvant treatment did not persist over time.

Our study found the well-documented survival advantages of patients treated in high volume hospitals was independent of the advantages of high surgeon surgical volume. Surgeon self-designated speciality and hospital teaching status did not explain these advantages.

Our study found surgeons identified several factors deserve additional research including location of tumor in the rectum where a sphincter-sparing surgery could be recommended, preoperative radiation and patient incontinence and preference. Special care must be taken to simultaneously address surgeon specialty, surgeon gender, and time since receipt of the MD degree.

The present study addresses areas in the literature where there was controversy or lack of research. Limitations include small sample sizes, non-response and missing information. Despite these limitations, the findings highlight some interesting findings and provide guidance for additional research.
